

LUXURY IS

A Balanced Approach

Strong architectural features meet tasteful furnishings for a room that exudes pure mountain luxury

PHOTO BY DAVID O. MARLOW

SETTING THE STAGE

Few spaces unite architecture and interior design with such feel-good accord as this great room in an Aspen Highlands home designed by architect Jamie Brewster McLeod and interior designer Karen Moore.

Brewster McLeod worked with a palette of uniform—but far from bland—materials to define the large room’s architectural elements: fir for the trusses, walnut for the floors, and Arkansas moss stone for the columns and fireplace. “Everything feels very comfortable, very uniform in style, texture and luxury,” she says, “but there are accents throughout the harmonious palette.”

To blend architecture with furnishings, Moore worked with the homeowners to handpick their favorite fabrics and textures, then carefully wove them into the space. Rather than introducing many colors, Moore chose varying textures to add nuance to the room. To perfect the mood, she designed a layout of custom-made lighting fixtures: an impressive chandelier to occupy the lofty ceiling space and a series of wall sconces that add just the right amount of glow.

www.brewstermcLeod.com
www.interiorsetc.com

more  Visit www.mountainliving.com for a guide to this room’s products and pros.